Jaguar is going all-electric by 2025

(Information taken from an article in "Gear Patrol" publication by Tyler Duffy)

It is understood the Jaguar Land Rover group will be giving the British luxury-slash-sports car brand a new image from nearly the ground up. Jaguar will become an all-electric car brand by 2025, and they will do so with almost an entirely new vehicle lineup. The current Jaguar internal combustion lineup will be scrapped. Jaguar has also already killed off an XJ sedan successor that was just about ready for production. Jaguar will relaunch with three new SUVs. According to Autocar, the smaller one will be sold in both two and four-door versions, positioned as two separate SUVs. It will offer both single-motor and dual-motor AWD versions. It will be joined by a larger four-door SUV only offering a dual-motor AWD powertrain. All three models – built in Jaguar Land Rover's Solihull plant – will share a new electric-only platform known as Panthera, with "similar mechanical packages", and prices from £80,000 ($AU140,000), to as much as £200,000 ($AU350,000). The Panthera platform underpinning the new Jaguar models – developed by Jaguar Land Rover and Austrian engineering giant Magna – will be on the "technical cutting edge", Autocar says, with likely 800-volt fast charging, cloud connectivity and plenty of processing power. The vehicles will likely be sportier and more overtly road-going to distinguish themselves from Land Rover. The arrival of the new Jaguar luxury electric cars in 2025 will spell the end of the current range, comprising the XE and XF sedans, E-Pace, F-Pace and I-Pace SUVs, and the F-Type V8 sports car.

"Jaguar Land Rover" is no more. The company confirmed plans to rebrand itself as JLR. Jaguar will be one of four divisions in a House of Brands strategy that will also include Range Rover, Defender and Discovery lineups. That repositioning could sort of make sense for Jaguar. Presumably, Range Rover will be the luxury EVs, Defender will be the off-roading EVs and Discovery would be the more affordable EVs. That could leave a niche for Jaguar to offer the sportier options.

The new Jaguars are not expected to be seen for a while. Per Autocar, Jaguar wants to show, not tell with this transition. As a result, the brand may not provide details until it has a flashy, almost-production-ready prototype to show off. And that may not happen until late 2024 — though we'd expect something to be announced or leaked before then. However, a change of management at the top recently in the company may lead to altered projects, focuses and timelines. We could see Jaguar broaden its vision or we could also see JLR's owners, the Tata Group, opt to reduce the Jaguar lineup altogether and focus on three Land Rover brands.

There were no Minutes for June as the meeting was cancelled due to some members becoming ill.
